IN THE NORTH WOODS.

BURNED ROCK CAMP, BEAVER RIVER, New York, Nov. 15th, 1905.

Continued from last week. Monday the Junior leaves us. help him with his deer and other effects to the station, and I believe I must confess to a slight feeling of homesickness at his departure, but this soon vanishes in the interest of the woods and of the chase. Monday, Tuesday and Wednesday are bootless days. The woods are noisy; occasionally one of us gets a glimpse of deer, but no successful shots were fired, but on Thursday evening the camp story is different. Liab and the Senior have triumphant smiles on their faces which bespeaks satisfaction. Liab with the caution of an Indian brave has crept upon a fine doe and captured her in bed; a nice thing to do.

The Senior tells the story of how two ed upon a giant birch root, his gaze resting on the valley beneath him, when two fine deers walk into view, an unconscious thing to do, for however he might admire them in their natural ways of the wood, they presented in his mind a greater beauty hung at his lodge door. Two quick sharp reports and the larger one has fallen; two others at her companion, but are unsuccessful, and silence once more broods over the forest. As I stand beside my trophy I confess to a feeling of compassion, almost a re-Hulbert and family of Otsdawa, visited gret; but, ah me, it is the ways of man.

Monday. Ed is a little late to-night. All the rest of us are in camp, and are discussing his unseasonableness, without uneasiness however. We are acquainted with his persistency and we know his familiarity with the woods; and sure enough he soon appears. We note perhaps a little unusual appearance of weariness, coupled with a sort of placid, satisfied expression of countenance which puzzles us a little, and when banteringly quizzed as to where he has left his deer, he answers quietly, "down by the big pine" Then the story comes out, not unlike my own. Two deers came to him near the same locality, the larger

I go out into the solitary woods to bid my little friend, the red squirrel, good bye. I tell him I have had a good time, a successful hunt, and perhaps after OPP. POSTOFFICE, many moons, when the snow has lain thick in the valley and on the mountain and melted away in the spring sunshine; when bud and blossom have unfolded in leaf and flower, and these have withered and faded and fallen in the chill and blast of another autumn, if the Great Spirit permits, maybe I will come again to listen to his welcoming song in the beech tree by the river. His eyes are big and bright, his little limbs and body quiver with feeling as he skurries away E018011, and the to hide his grief in the thick cover of an evergreen. The wagon has finally come for us; we load our effects on and follow it to the station, where at 1:30 p. m. we board the train and at evening are once in camp is passed in writing and posting letters home, in reading those received and in other social ways.

There is one little incident I might omit, but think I will tell you. I think it happened on Wednesday of the last week in camp. The senior and I were returning to camp a little earlier than usual from the opposide side of the river, and in doing so were compelled to walk a dry peeled log across the stream, here no more than a rod in width and two feet in depth. A little melting snow had made the log very slippery and when about half way across I heard a splash followed by a gurgling, spluttering noise, and I beheld the Senior scambling back to the log like a wet and he had been precipitated head foremost into the river, gun, acoutrements and everything. It was not a pleasant walk back to camp, where the bantering was very warm, to which the Senior retorted by reminding them there were those who would stay in camp a fort-morning we broke camp, and while waiting for the team we have ordered, but one thing more remains to be done.
